

How to have a “Remember who the fuck you are!” day starter pack!

This little E-book (and accompanying audio) are going to help you remember who the fuck you are again!

It’s going to show you how to have various different kinds of “Remember who the fuck you are!” days. Depending on what’s going on and where you’re at in your life.

I’m going to take you on a little self-coaching and self- discovery journey and I am confident you are going to have lots of little AHA moments along the way.

You’ll remember pieces of you, that you’d completely forgotten about.

You’ll bring parts of you out that have been buried for so long.

You’ll start to connect with versions of you that have always been there under the surface waiting to pop out again!

And you’re going to LOVE the way you feel at the end.

There is no right or wrong way to do these days (and they don’t have to be a whole day if that’s not possible), but there is a simple format to follow, with some key non-negotiables to ensure you get the most out of your day.

Here is the summary (I break it down further underneath)

1. Choose a venue
2. Decide a timeframe
3. Prepare for peace
4. Inspirational resources to hand
5. Nourishment for the day
6. Dopamine dressing
7. Headspace/ contact breaks
8. Exploration, expansive and exciting mindset
9. Emotions may surface
10. Back to reality

Please read through these 10 sections BEFORE planning your day and starting the “Remember who the fuck you are!” self-coaching questions!

Your Remember who the fuck you are venue!

Ideally you want to be out your own environment on neutral territory and ideally in some kind of inspirational place.

My favourite places are a spa hotel; either sitting on a bed by a pool or quiet area and I used to love having “Remember who the fuck you are” 24 hour stays!

If the weather is nice, you can do it outside in nature, you could take yourself off to a river or lake. You could go to a nice café, or house sit. Or spend the day at a friend’s house whilst they are at work.

If you can’t do this and need to do it at home, then my advice would be to make a room in your house different to what it usually is. Declutter it, get some nice blankets and a vase of flowers, perhaps some candles.

Being in an inspirational and uplifting environment – something that is different to your usual set up is really important. You will get way more from your day as a result!

And also somewhere that you feel comfortable getting emotional – I’m yet to know anyone who hasn’t done one of these and not shed a tear!

Decide a timeframe!

I love to have a whole day at my local hotel / gym / spa that I’m a member of. I like to pace myself and give myself the gift of time. I’ll have a workout, then maybe a jacuzzi, then I’ll spend a couple of hours doing some “Remember who the fuck you are” questions. Then I might have a lunch break and a little walk. And then come back for some more. And then a swim to process what I’ve uncovered before I go back home to my children.

I do think you need at least a couple of hours. But if you just have two hours for example, just do it for two – that’s waaay better than not doing it at all!

Half a day can be a great option too – ideally when you have good energy. So if you’re a morning person do it in the morning, evening do in the evening.

I highly recommend doing 24 hours now and again. Such a luxury!

I’ve done this in the past, calling it a “Mumcation”!

When I used to have an au pair when my daughter was little, I used to book 24 hours in a hotel once a month, look forward to it like it was Christmas and it was a game changer!

In a “Mumcation” trip, you can combine “Remember who the fuck you are!” exercises, along with anything else that lifts you up. Room service, Netflix, gossip mags; whatever you fancy!

If you’ve never done this before, I really would love you to create at least a few hours.

Prepare for peace

What I mean by this is spend time thinking what you might need to do so that you can completely enjoy this time, without worrying about other people or things.

You want to be able to have some uninterrupted time – both from other people AND wandering, worrying thoughts.

Ask yourself what do I need to do, prepare or communicate to others ahead of my “Remember who the fuck you are!” day.

School pick ups, meals for kids, dog walker, work out where you’re going to park if travelling somewhere, booking a table, emergency numbers, that you’re going to be uncontactable at certain time etc.

And ideally the morning of your day, you don’t want to be rushing around like a headless chicken. Do as much as you can the night before, so you head into your YOU time a little more fabulous and a little less frazzled!

If you start your “Remember who the fuck you are!” day thinking and worrying about others; it’s a them day not a you day which defeats the object!

Inspirational resources to hand

Working through the “Remember who the fuck you are” questions and writing answers on scrap pieces of paper, or the back of your shopping lists is a big NO-NO. So is writing on crumpled paper with flaky pens!

Take this day seriously and make it as magical as you can!

My big tip is to buy yourself a lovely, little notebook. And a few nice pens, perhaps even a highlighter or some different colours.

These don’t need to be expensive, but writing in a beautiful notebook, will mean you are more likely to read this book, want to come back to this book and write more even.

You may decide to carry on answering questions as a little morning journaling practice.

You may also want to take a nice bag with you to put these in.

Environment is everything when bringing out the best of you ☺

If you are choosing to do your day outside in nature, choose a nice blanket or chair to sit on.

Nourishment for the day

If you're hungry with a grumbly tummy, you'll get cranky and your mind will be lazy.

So think about some nice meals, snacks and water for the day.

I like to fill up a large bottle with some slices of lemon, cucumber, basil and mint. I might plan a coffee break and head up the spa café. I don't tend to snack generally but I'd always take something to avoid serious hunger pangs.

If I'm in the Spa hotel, I would usually book a nice lunch and take a 45 minute break and refuel on a tasty salad etc.

If you're doing your day at home or a friend's house. Or, you're having it outside, please make up a really tasty lunch. Not your usual cheese and pickle sandwich, some crisps and apple. Or a Tesco's meal deal!

But make a little effort to make something a little more tasty - and indulgent.

You may also want to take some herbal tea in a flask, have some scented wipes for example.

And don't carry your lunch and snacks in an old Tesco's carrier bag with holes in it!

Choose a nice lunch box. You could even write yourself a little note that says "You deserve this day, enjoy!" on it 😊

Dopamine Dressing

This is where you wear something that makes you feel good. You don't need to buy a new outfit for the day. But, wearing something that's a little more uplevel if you're always in a tracksuit, or a little more relaxed, if you're always in a black suit. Or, wear a colour you absolutely love or your favourite outfit you don't wear half as much as you want to – will make a big difference.

This Dopamine dressing concept I got from a stylist who said sometimes it's so good to work from the outside in. I think on a day like this it's inwards out AND outwards in 😊

When I do my "Remember who the fuck you are!" day in a spa, I take my leopard print kaftan to throw over my swimsuit. I have a nice clip to tie my hair up, I might get my nails painted my favourite colour.

You shouldn't feel that you need to do loads before hand. Or, put yourself under any pressure. You might even decide to paint your nails your favourite colour after your day; to remind you to keep remembering who the fuck you are!

But wearing things that lift you or connect you with the real or lost you, can really help.

Headspace / contact breaks

You won't want to be answering all the self-coaching questions all in one hit! So my biggest piece of advice is to do some of them, then rest, then do a bit more and then rest.

You don't need to time-block days like this, but creating a little bit of headspace to process some things you've brought up, to get some fresh air, to let some emotions out, to defrag your mind if you've written lots down is really important.

I DO think that NOT having contact with other people is quite important on these sorts of days. Because it's incredible how we can be drawn out our ME zone and lose momentum.

But if you need to, I advise blocking out 2 or 3, 5-10 minutes slots throughout the whole day if you need to quickly check in with anything or anyone.

However, if you've done your 'prepare for peace', as above. This should alleviate this.

And also, remember 20 years ago, we didn't have smart phones, 30 years ago most of us didn't have a mobile (I mean goodness I travelled round the world by myself at 21 without a phone or lap top!), so we just weren't interrupted or had the 'need to know' that we have now.

Give yourself a proper break – just for one day!

Exploration, expansive and exciting mindset

With the self-coaching questions that I've prepared for you, I am taking you on a journey that is designed to be uplifting, rewarding and rejuvenating.

They questions are designed to create little reunions with the lost you, the old you and the real you. And create connections to the new you, the potential you and the future you.

Please head into this coaching experience with curiosity and excitement. This is the beauty of coaching; you never know where you'll go or what you'll dig up!

Sometimes you'll have AHA and lightbulb moments, or big breakthroughs and emotions when you least expect it!

Remember, there is no right or wrong way to answering the questions.

Not all the questions will sit right with you or feel right with you and you don't need to answer them all – at all!

But if you go into your “Remember who the fuck you are!” day, with an open mind, choose to explore the depths of your thoughts. And embrace all that this will bring.

If you’re not used to answering coaching questions, as many people aren’t. Don’t over think things. Go with gut reaction, what comes up first, you can take your time and think of course; nothing should feel rushed.

But there should never be ANY judgement of what comes out of your head or your pen ☺

Emotions may surface

When I have got myself into a bad place (usually where I’m heading into burn out because my crazy home life has got on top of me), there are often lots of emotions bubbling away under the threshold. That why, when I stop and reconnect with myself, they all come out!

I have wailed like a baby answering some of these very questions in the past. I have curled up in a ball and howled with tears as I’ve hit breakthroughs. I have got angry and wanted to scream at the top of my lungs with rage and upset and punch something.

Sometimes I have sat with tears streaming down my face, quietly.

Feeling like I’ve wanted to climb under a blanket and never got out.

ALL NORMAL!

But then I’ve regrouped, remembered who the fuck I am.

And got the fuck fired up about my future and my infinite potential and possibility.

All emotions are OK. It is good to feel these things.

BUT...

You are not with a coach doing this, it’s a ME experience. Which means you’re by yourself.

Every one of my clients who’s done this, has found it more helpful than harmful. More uplifting than terrifying. More expansive than contractive.

But some big things may come up for some of you; uncomfortable feelings, grief, frustration, injustice, trauma etc. And some may struggle to know what to do with the emotions or hidden AHAs that have been locked inside you.

This is designed to be a hugely positive experience, but if you're unsure whether you're ready to dive in, my advice is to read all the questions, decide which ones you are going to do first. And start with the ones that you can immediately feel more comfortable with 😊

Or do this with a coach who can help and guide you.

Back to reality

Having a "Remember who the fuck you are!" day, is all about reigniting your inner flame.

You are likely to end the day feeling pumped about finding these buried parts you, you'll have some things you want to action, changes you want to make, bits of you that you want to bring out and never ever bury again.

You may feel utterly enthusiastic and determined to never lose yourself again. And create a life and identity where you thrive and can be unapologetically you.

You may be feeling that you can dance through life again.

But then you'll go back to your current reality.

And you may feel a bit deflated.

And the energy you created from your "Remember who the fuck you are!" day, may dwindle.

This is OK! It's not that you're going backwards. It hasn't been a waste of time.

But what you need to do is go back to your reality and remind yourself every single day who the fuck you are and keep bringing that version of you to life!

You need to hatch a plan.

Get right behind yourself.

Create some get the fuck fired up your life goals!

And can create some regular "Remember who the fuck you are!" slots in the week.

My advice is to journal like a ninja (5 mins a day is all it takes)

And re-read all the answers from your "Remember who the fuck you are day!" as much as possible.

Listen to any kind of inspirational messages or words that support you to become the real and wonderful version of you.

And keep building that momentum.

Write down reminders of the person you want to be.

And keep reading them.

Put post it notes everywhere if it helps!

When you've planned your optimum "Remember who the fuck you are!" day, print off the second E-book with the questions for you to go through on the day!

Janey x

